

1 Introduction. This report evaluates a process-in-memory configuration. Across the twelve evaluated workloads, the process-in-memory configuration reduced measured off-chip data movement by 41 percent relative to the baseline.

3 Method and limitations. All twelve workloads were drawn from a single benchmark family and executed on one hardware platform. No independent replication was performed and the evaluation used a single random seed, so the reported interval reflects run-to-run variation only.